

Data Analyst Blog Post

October 3, 2019

Looking at dog_rates Twitter data, I found some interesting trends.

First, the three most common dog types that were rated were Golden Retrievers, Labrador Retrievers, and Pembroke Welsh Corgis. This aligns well with data from the American Kennel Club because the 5 most popular dog types of 2018 are Labs in first and then Goldens in third. So there are probably more pictures of these dogs being sent to @dog_rates. This may not be the only reason, however, and so I am leaving it up to you, the reader, to decide. Is it because these dogs are more common, or are these breeds just that much cuter? The visualization can be found below:

Second, the most common @dog_rates classification for the dogs was pupper with 11% of the ratings including this classifier. Next was doggo with 4%, then pupper with 1%, and finally, floofer with 0.4%. So you can clearly see that puppies are more common and floofers are quite difficult to come across. Finally, I wanted to see what the average rating was from @dog_rates. Of course, they have a unique way of rating images! It seems that the average rating sits at around 117% which goes to show you how great dogs are!

The data was collected from about 5000+ total tweets gathered from @dog_rates. This data was then collected into a file which can be found attached.